The Voice Service uses powered telecommunications and internet/network equipment and is not equivalent to a traditional independently powered copper telephone service.

5.2 Existing Numbers

Where an existing Avington Voice Service transfers from ENSA to Fibre Up:

- a. Fibre Up expects the existing telephone number to remain associated with the Service; and
- b. no customer number-porting activity is expected to be required as part of the initial change of ownership.

If an upstream provider advises that a number port or other customer authorisation is required, Fibre Up will contact you before taking the relevant action.

Where your plan includes telephone services, included calls currently comprise the following call types:

- a. local calls;
- b. national landline calls;
- c. calls to Australian mobile numbers;

The Voice Service supports calls to Triple Zero (000) while the Service is operating.

Calls to Triple Zero are free.

You must provide Fibre Up with accurate and current service-address information.

5.5 Power Failure

If power is unavailable to equipment required to provide the Service, your Voice Service will not operate.

This means you may be unable to make or receive telephone calls, including calls to Triple Zero (000), during a power outage.

You should maintain an alternative way of making emergency calls, such as a charged mobile telephone.

This limitation applies regardless of whether the outage affects Fibre Up equipment, customer equipment or other powered telecommunications infrastructure.

Changes to upstream platforms, maintenance activities or faults may affect the availability of Voice Services.

To the extent that the Telecommunications Customer Service Guarantee Standard applies to your Voice Service, Fibre Up will comply with the applicable requirements.

Customers are not required to waive applicable Customer Service Guarantee rights, however Fibre Up reserves the right to not supply services without a waiver.
